

Back to Words: The Dead Man's Party Revision

By Holly Lisle

The last few days have been wordless because of the ongoing chaos, which still has to get a lot worse before it can start getting better.

Today, though, I managed to write Chapter 9 – 1956 words. Again because this is still inside the first twelve chapters where I had not yet figured out the story I was telling or where and when it took place, these were all brand-new words, and from the POV of Laurie, the brand-new character who picks up a part of the story I needed but mostly missed in the first draft – that of the Caravan Volunteer.

I like her. She's too young for the job she's taken, but she's tougher than her years. And she's going to be a very cool secondary hero.
