

Blogs are addictive

By Holly Lisle

Wanting to know if people are reading them is also apparently addictive. Matthew Edgar, who's fighting hard to be timely and relevant and to have something to say (which isn't all that common, I'm discovering from my growing perusal of other people's blogs) has a charming air of desperation to his. You really ought to take a look. Really. And then let him know you looked. I have the feeling you'll make his day.
