

The DMP Revision, and the WRONG End of the String – Family and Brain Surgery

By Holly Lisle

The string in the title is CHAOS, and in the little image on my blog, we are currently not in the neat and spiffy central spiral, but in the dark tangle out at the end.

I'll start with the happier stuff. Today was Revision Monday, and I got just over half of the remainder of the write-in revision of Dead Man's Party finished. Seventy-six pages revised and noted. Only seventy manuscript pages remain, and my hope is to be able to finish that on my next Revision Monday, whenever that might be.

The type-in revision is going to be a bitch, but I discovered that the stuff I wrote for the character who is going to be eliminated in the final version is actually excellent, contains very good conflict plus active worldbuilding for the story world, set in the near and deadly future, and can be given to the new male lead in the new version as the first couple of chapters of the novel.

The other news is more chaos, but not the good and happy chaos we've been in for the last couple of months.

My brother-in-law is back in the hospital following seizures, and has discovered that the parts of the brain tumor that his previous doctor couldn't get out some years ago because they were attached to the brainstem have grown in the interim. Are now causing weakness in his extremities, seizures, some other not-good things.

On the bright side, brain surgery has improved a lot in the last half a decade. On the dark side, it's still brain surgery.

SO... He has big brain surgery pending. This is not a little deal. It's currently planned for Thursday, but that might change. So the next couple of weeks might have me gone a lot.

Contents © Holly Lisle. <https://hollylisle.com> All Rights Reserved

---

DMP Revision Monday, and Not Too Early for the Halloween Listener Episode

By Holly Lisle

I did four hours of work on Dead Man's Party yesterday.

I got one page of manuscript done.

HOWEVER, I finally got the chance to do the thing I used to do first – world building.

I got six closely written pages of worldbuilding done, in which I figured out (this is AFTER having written the whole first draft of the novel) how my hero works.

Why would I do worldbuilding after writing the whole first novel and being well into revision? Because by working with an incredibly light concept in first draft, I allowed myself to find the story I really wanted to tell – and it took me twelve chapters to find that world. They were chapters in which I got to know the characters, and in a couple of cases didn't. They were chapters in which I found the real conflict, for which I only had a vague concept when I started.

It's a funny way to work for me, but it saved me a helluva lot of time getting started, it allowed me to finish, and it kept me from having a notebook full of stuff I won't use... because I thought I was building an entirely different world than the one I wrote.

Here's an example:

In the earlier part of revision, I discovered that the guy I wrote as my hero was a complete non-character, while the guy who wasn't even supposed to be there became not just a great character, but a guy I really loved.

Here's another example:

I discovered twelve chapters into first draft that I needed to move the story from Year Ten back to Year Two, because if I didn't, one of the characters (the one who I've now removed) would have been dumber than a bag of bricks.

I LOVE what I got yesterday. It doesn't count as words – what I built will have to be used during type-in revision – new stuff that will replace things I'm ripping completely out. But what I discovered gives me the conflict for the first part of the book where I have to completely redo the places where the story is set, and bring in the Post-Apocalypse that I discovered twelve chapters in had happened just two years earlier, not ten.

And now, for something completely different...

WRITERS: The AIARWIP.com Halloween Episode is COMING!!!

Last year in our FIRST Halloween episode, my daughter Rebecca, my son Mark, and I all read (and sort of dramatized) 500-word short fiction written by podcast listeners. We are going to do it again.

Which means you can submit ONE 500-word story you've written to us at the podcast – more details on that when we're actually ready to start accepting.

But it means you have to know how to write 500-word stories. PLOTTED 500-word stories. Not slice-of-life, not mood pieces, not and-then-they-all-died.

Real stories. If you have not every learned how to do this, How to Write Flash Fiction That Doesn't SUCK is my free writing class – and to understand what I mean by REAL stories, listen to the stories last year that won.

Our First AIARWIP Halloween Listener Edition is here. We will only accept one story submission per writer, but to get your best story, you generally need to write a batch of them. Which the class is set up to help you do. By the time you finish, you'll have written eleven stories.

Contents © Holly Lisle. <https://hollylisle.com> All Rights Reserved

---

Podcast Difficulties

Technical

By Holly Lisle

Becca was out of town, a raw cut of just her talking got uploaded instead of the edited episode, so she's working on getting what was to have been today's episode corrected. The broken one has already been pulled down.

HOWEVER... (yeah, there's always one of those), this being the holiday season, lots more people are uploading things, so we cannot know when the correct, finished episode will become available.

We apologize for the error, and will have the next episode to you as quickly as possible.

Contents © Holly Lisle. <https://hollylisle.com> All Rights Reserved