

Why I love history: Ancient Roman Dick Jokes

Venus on Alert in Ancient Pompeii

I have been doggedly trying to find out more about the Roman Republic (pre-Caesars, pre-decline, pre-depravity). It's almost impossible. The Romans were a successful self-governing people with a working republic for five hundred years and change, but damn near every resource I can locate begins at the point where their corrupt senators handed over control to individual despots and everything went to hell. I want to know how they succeeded for five hundred years. I think Americans, as a self-governing people, might all want to know that. But no. Apparently everyone else only wants to know how they failed.

Anyway, I was watching a history of the excavation of Pompeii. My husband was half-watching, but at the same time discussing with our son the sensationalist structure of the show we were watching and its emphasis on destruction and depravity, with the documentary collectivist mindset of "this was all the Roman people lumped into one vast generalization," rather than "this was a one-day snapshot of the lives of some rich Romans on vacation."

Watching the show, listening to my husband and son, an object I couldn't quite believe passed before my eyes.

I said, "Dude, stop. Whoa, stop, stop, stop, you gotta see this. Back it up." My husband did the Manly Remote Thing, and backed up the documentary. He didn't have to ask me where to stop. The object on display for just that instant was a bronze phallus. Sort of. It was a bronze phallus with legs and feet, wings, a tail that ended in another phallus...and the phallus had its own phallus, neatly situated between its legs. And bells. Don't forget the bells.

And this...er...creature...was looking around a corner.

I was laughing my ass off. My husband and son burst out laughing too.

The narrator had been droning on about the Roman equation of the phallus with luck, and here was this amazing, beautifully finished, exquisitely detailed, frikkin' hilarious piece of artwork that some dude one day before 79 AD had created, and the massive bore of a historian and the flat-voiced narrator didn't stop for so much as a giggle. They were intent on turning this goofy, delightful bit of creativity into a tedious proof of a deadly dull point, and frankly, I didn't give a shit about the speculative Roman collective mentality regarding the significance of the phallus.

I wanted to know who the guy was who made that thing, because he was a funny, funny guy. It was the fact that he made the thing look around a corner that got me.

Bugger has been dead for pretty close to two thousand years now. And what he created made me laugh.

To me, this is history. Not who were those people, but who was that guy?

ADDED LATER:

The questions really driving me batty:

- Was this the guy's job, or was it his hobby?

If job, what was the job title for this particular specialty, so that if someone asked you where you got your interesting front porch ornament, you could say, "You can buy them from Phallius, the ... what?"

If hobby, well-okay. Sure. I'm betting some guy in Kansas has a similar one.

- How many guys had this job, and if so, were they in competition?

I'm saying there were at least two, because there are some significant differences in style in some of the...chimes. Matt suspects this was two guys and an elaborate practical joke on each other, with one sneaking his latest creation onto the other guy's front porch in the dead of night and hanging it there, and the other guy making one with one more phallus than his friend made, and hanging that thing in front of HIS house. And the two of them, caught by neighbors in the midst of these shenanigans, saying, "Oh, these are good luck charms." And the neighbor saying, "Really?! I could use some luck. Could I buy one? Only with more dicks?"

That's the sort of thing that could spawn an industry.

▪ Was this the equivalent of the tourist T-shirt?

Go to Pompeii, get a dick? Nobody found any of these things (that I know of) prior to the excavation of Pompeii, so was this actually a tourist collectible, emphasizing the thing the town of 20,000 was best known for? "Pompeii, Home of the Dick?"
